THE END OF JOHNSON.

A Leaf from the Early History of Iowa that is Better

THAN A VOLUME OF FICTION.

Mystery, Adventure, Love and Trage dy Involved in a Plain Tale from the Prairies ... Kit, the Queen of a Thousand Isles, Belle of the Giddy Capital and Heroine of a Frontier Romance.

Chicago Times.

The winter of 1841-42 was a period of stirring events in the newly organized territory of Iowa, Government commissioners were negotiating with the Indians for a large tract of land lying between the two great western rivers, a narrow belt commonly designated 'the strip," stretching along the Mississippi, having already been ceded. There the machinery of government had been set up. There the star of empire paused in its western course.

Iowa City was the center of excitement and activity. The seat of local and national authority was there, it being the site of the government land office and the territorial capital. To the former came squatters to enter their claims; to the latter came members-elect of the general assembly, also politicians and office-seekers in general, intent on seizing any opportunity of-fered by the main chance. Situated at the verge of the border-

Situated at the verge of the border-land, it was a popular rendezvous for men of all trades and professions, for part of whom there was ready employment and to all of whom the country beyond was a land of great expectations. Later on the population was largely augmented by the arrival of gamblers, thieves, and a motley mob of adventurers in various ways and by sundry means, bankrupt in morals and business, drawn thither by the hope of finding in the changing state of affairs a change of fortune and reputations, as they had everything to gain and nothing to lose in exchanging old acquaintances for new ones. tances for new ones.

tances for new ones.

Among these adventurers was Col.
William Johnson, who claimed to be the same that led in the Canadian revolt of 1838, and some account of whom is given in Scribner's Monthly of April, is given in Scribner's Monthly of April, 1878. His prepossessing appearance, pleasing address, and talent for leader-ship would have of themselves soon made their possessor a favorite among the cosmopolitans who pioneer the way to the land of the Sacs and Foxes. Moreover, these personal characteristics were supplemented by other adjuncts of popularity—such, for instance, as being the hero of a border war, the incidents of which were then fresh in the memory of all Americans, being but the memory of all Americans, being but recently the subject of official corre-spondence between the foreign minis-ters of Great Britain and the United States.

There was still another circumstance which readily introduced Col. Johnson to the favor of the people: He was accompanied by a most fascinating girl whom he introduced to the society of the poneer capital as "Kit," and that, too, without making any explanation of the doubtful relation, so that whether it was that of daughter, wife, or sweetheart was left to the indulgent surmises of a not very fastidious public opinion. Johnson at times referred to Kit as the "Queen of a Thousand Isles," and as some of the best informed remembered that in the Canadian revolt a certain girl had acted a very important part, girl had acted a very important part, whether rightfully or not, she soon be-came identified as the heroine of the St. Lawrence.

After having reigned as autocrat of the capital of the border land for som the capital of the border land for some months Johnson cast his eye longingly to other fields of conquest, and it can easily be surmised that there were reasons for this. Having no money and no means of support, either visible or remote, the courtiers of him and his fair companion at length tired of the luxury of their society.

In those days there were no roads nor clearly defined trails leading north from

In those days there were no roads nor clearly defined trails leading north from Iowa City. Dubuque, which for some time had acquired great prominence on account of its lead mines, needed such a road or trail to the capital more than road or trail to the capital more than any other settlement, and as persons frequently got lost in making a trip it was thought to be a matter of necessity as well as an exhibition of public spirit on the part of the people of Iowa City to open some reliable means of commuto open some reliable means of commu-nication with their enterprising neighbors of the north. Thus it was that late in the full of 1841 a pioneer who was the fortunate owner of a "bull-plow" and yoke of oxen, was em-ployed to draw a furrow from the cap-tial to Dubuque, a distance of ninety miles.

Johnson had made his advent into

miles.

Johnson had made his advent into the society of the capital astride a shaggy mule, with Kit seated behind him in true pioneer fashion. By what means the mule subsisted during the winter is a deep, dark question, but at any rate when Johnson determined to set out for Dubuque his means of transportation did not fail him. Seated on the back of this plebean beast the hero and heroine of so many feats and feasts started early one morning in the spring of 1842, and, following the furrow, in due caurse of time reached Dubuque.

Upon arriving there Johnson would doubtless have entered upon another era of prosperity but for a circumstance invariably fatal to the schemes of adventurers—everybody was busy. All the energy of the then metropolis of Iowa expended itself on lead, and lead was dull to one of Johnson's mettle. He was not long in making up his mind to move on; so he moved, this time to the center of Buchanan county. The boundaries of that county had but recently been designated by the general assembly, no organization had been formed, and but few scattering settlements had been made.

Johnson's plans were to found a city ments had been made.

Johnson's plans were to found a city at the geographical centre of the county, where he hoped to draw about him a sufficient number of immigrants, make the place the seat of justice, and by his address reap all the honors and emoluments of organizing the county. His plans were well laid, and he would certainly have succeeded but for the certainly have succeeded but for the presence in the county of another adventurer of equal address and more force of will.

This man's name was Bennett. He had arrived the previous autumn and started a proposed seat of justice near the present site of Quasqueton. Bennett had the advantage of priority of settlement; Johnson's advantage was in location. He who possessed the priority of settlement viewed with jealous eye the abode of him who had the advantage of location, and so, having coleye the added of him who had the advantage of location, and so, having collected a number of neighbors who were identified with him in aim and interest, Bennett, unexpectedly to Johnson, bore down on the latter, seized his person bore it thence to an eminence and tied it to a tree, whence in a few moments he looked down on the embryo county seat to behold his abode go down to ashes and his anticipations go up in smoke. Johnson was then released and told

Johnson was then released and told-to go west, where there was more room. Having regained his liberty Johnson concluded he would not admit the jus-tice of the claims of a half dozen squat-ters to a whole county of land, and so went to the legal authorities and made complaint. Bennett and his friends hearing of this thought best to leave the county temporarily, and in wandering about became bewildered, were over-taken by a severe snowstorm and a about became bewildered, were over-taken by a severe snowstorm and a number were frozen to death, while others were so affected by the frost that they were crippled for life. Ben-nett, himself, however, was possessed of such a vigorous constitution that he es-caped unharmed, and in the presence of his dead and dying companions he vowed vengeance.

of his dead and dying companions he vowed vengeance.

Johnson hearing of these threats concluded to leave the country, and accordingly set out for Mahaska county, where he hoped to be beyond the reach of his enemy. During all these adventures Kit had been his faithful and constant companion and ally and when he At had been his faithful and constant companion and ally, and when he located on Middle creek, in Mahaska county, she was still with him, possessed of all the beauty and grace which distinguished her at the time of their arrival at the capital city two years previous. Persons who had seen her with Johnson at Iowa City in 1841 renewed her acquaintance at the humble cabin on Middle creek, and while they noted no change in her personal noted no change in her personal appearance they did detect a decided change in the relations existing between her and her guardian.

In his wanderings Johnson had fallen

In his wanderings Johnson had fallen in with an organized gang of horsethieves, and about the time of his removal to Mahasha county, either through ambition for leadership or through hopes of gain, or, what after proved to be the most probable consideration, through a desire to gain powerful confederates who would assist him in his fend with Bennett, became one of their number. By some means the girl found this out. She disapproved of his association with the gang, and, Johnson retusing to yield to her admonition, forever forfeited her esteem and lost his influence over her. While in Iowa City and all through the vicissitudes of the Buchannan county episode he seemed and all through the vicissitudes of the Buchannan county episode he seemed to absolutely possess her good will and confidence; now he could only control her by threats and menace.

During Johnson's absence on business with the gang Kit formed the acquaintance of a young man named Peck, and a strong attachment soon sprang up between them. Through Peck's influence a neighboring family induced the girl to leave her lonesome cabin and take to leave her lonesome cabin and take up her abode with them. When John-son returned and found his cabin de-serted he did not manifest much concern, but when he afterwards learned of the attachment which had been formed between Kit and Peck during his ab-sence, and, that an several occasions persons from Buchanan county had in-quired for him, he became suspicious and angry. He compelled Kit to re-turn to the cabin, assumed arbitrary control over her conduct, and on several occasions threatened to kill her. In a few weeks Johnson had occasion to leave on another expedition and the attachment which had been formed

In a few weeks Johnson had occasion to leave on another expedition, and while gone Peck and Kit were married. In a few days Johnson returned, and that night he was shot dead through a crevice in the cabin while standing in front of the fire. Peck was suspected by the authorities as the guilty party and was accordingly arrested and lodged in fail.

and was accordingly arrested and lodged in jail.

The case attracted general interest, and Col. Thompson and Judge Hall, subsequently members of Congress, volunteered to defend Peck. The judicial district was so large and terms of court occurred at such long intervals that Peck was compelled to lie in jail worst than a vegar watting that Is the that Peck was compelled to lie in jail more than a year awaiting trial. In the meantime Peck's attorneys, hearing that some of Johnson's friends contemplated having Kit arrested as an accomplished to the period of the period o complice in the murder, induced her to speedily and quietly leave the country and accept a temporary home with one of Hall's relatives in another state. A short time before Peck's case came

A short time before reek's case came up for trial a stranger mysteriously appeared one evening at the place where the accused had lived prior to his arrest. His words, which he addressed to the man of the house as he sat on his horse at the gate, were few and to the point. They were these: "I am from background a property and the point." point. They were these: "I am from Buchanan county; my name is Bennett; do not question Peck's innocence; I know he did not kill Johnson; I know who did."

who did."

With these words he rode away.

Peck was acquitted of the crime, his lawyers having no tromble to prove an alibi. He was informed what had become of Kit during his imprisonment, his counsel for prudential reasons not having told him before, and it is needless to add that they were soon reunited in their rude Iowa home.

In 1849 they removed to California,
